The Fairies' Dogs.

A SPECIAL PRIZE STORY.

BY KATHRIN TOMPKINS, OF THE HIGH SCHOOL DEPARTMENT OF NORMAL COLLEGE OF NEW-YORK CITY.

Once upon a time, near the borders of Fairyland, lived a King and his daughter. The Princess was only ten and had hundreds of dogs, and did nothing all day but play with them in the royal grounds. She was so merry and so kind that every one loved her, from the King, who almost worshipped her, down to the little scullery boy in the royal kitchen. He used to watch her as she played and wish that he could give her a dog.

One day when he was coming toward the palace he found in the road a little puppy, thin and lame and mangy. He picked it up carefully. "Perhaps," he thought, "the cook is in a good humor she will give me something for him." So he asked her for some scraps. But the cook was very angry at his daring to bring such a puppy within the royal grounds. She called a groom and gave him the puppy to take away, while the poor boy ran out into the royal woods and threw himself on the ground and cried; he was so sorry for the puppy.

But the Princess, who saw him crying, came running to him, for she didn't like to see any one unhappy. "What's the matter, boy?"

"The groom will hurt the puppy," he sobbed. "What puppy?" And she called the groom back. "It is one of my puppies, boy."

"No, Princess, I found him in the road. Let me see him, groom. Why I never saw a puppy like that before—he's so thin, and lame." And the Princess's eyes began to fill. "What are you going to do with him, groom?"

"Put him out in the road, Princess."

"Oh, Princess, don't let him!" begged the boy. "No, boy, I won't. Will you give him to me, boy?"

"Oh, yes, Princess."

"Give him to me, groom. Don't cry, boy, he'll soon be well." And she walked quietly away.

Now, you see, the Princess had never been outside the royal grounds, so she didn't know that there were dogs that were not well fed and happy like hers. That she wanted to the kennels and ordered that the puppy be well taken care of. Then she went in to her father and told him all about it.

"Father," she said, and she looked so unhappy that the King didn't know what to do. "Are there any more dogs like that poor puppy?"

Now, the King had decided that the Princess should never know any unhappiness, and was almost angry that she had taken the puppy. But he was more afraid that she would cry, so he quickly said:

"Oh, no, my dear, there isn't any other puppy like that now," which, he added to himself, "is probably true."

So the Princess was quite happy again. After a while the puppy grew well, and one day the Princess took him around to the rear of the palace.

"Send the boy out to me, cook," said the Princess. So the boy came out, and when he saw that the puppy was all well he jumped up and down with joy.

"I'm going to call him Boy, just as I call you Boy, and I thank you for giving him to me. I love him best of all my puppies. Goodbye. And he ran away.

And the boy was so happy that he turned three somersaults right under the cook's very eyes, and even smiled when she scolded, for he had at last given the Princess a dog.
